Terra Naomi, Sunday's Best

Always said your prayers, Like a good boy should, like a good boy should, Fingers pressed against the cold glass window watching stars so free, stars so free

You would run but where, Even if you could, even if you could, You could try but you'd never run fast enough to not be seen, not be seen

Every Sunday morning You would go to your church in your Sunday clothes, Daddy leads a choir of angels, if they'd only know But they'll never know, never know

The name of god is never taken in vain
But the hand of god is known to cause a multitude of pain,
When he speaks through your daddy
And he isn't very pleased
So shut your foul ungrateful mouth and get down on your knees

And have you seen my wounded Jesus Bloodied son of a preacher's mean touch Nothing like the cold shoulder of a pious man to Show you what true faith in god's love can't do

Mama looks away You know she got a dose of that religion yesterday Her sacrifices made Will someday set you free, set you free

She will not betray Her promises in front of god naively prayed, After years of living without questioning She still believes, she still believes

And have you seen my wounded Jesus Bloodied son of a preacher's mean touch Nothing like the cold shoulder of a pious man to Show you what true faith in god's love can't do

And I can blame his painful indecision
On the cruel unyielding arm of his religion
Don't know whether to stay a part of worldly things
Or close his eyes and take a breath and spread his wings
And fly away, fly away, fly away, fly away, flay away.

Always said your prayers, Like a good boy should, like a good boy should, Fingers pressed against the cold glass window watching stars so free